A Rich History of Innovation & Style

Since 1928, Karastan has been weaving the finest handmade rugs a machine ever made. American retailer and textile manufacturer Marshall Field built a loom capable of recreating the detailed craftsmanship of a hand-woven rug. The innovative method made possible the production of high-styled, quality carpets at prices affordable to average consumers. Karastan became synonymous with elegant machine-made rugs that rivaled their handmade counterparts, and the company became an American success story. So far advanced was the new manufacturing process that Karastan created a large version of its Kirman pattern for the 1933-34 World's Fair in Chicago and invited the world to walk on it. More than 5 million people left their footprints, spills and ground-in food stains all over the rug. Then it was time for cleanup. Half of the rug was cleaned so people could see how well our rugs recover. The rug still exists in the same state today – one side almost unrecognizably filthy, the other returned to its original beauty and luster. Today's Karastan rugs are still made in the USA, and produced in a manner that combines art, technology, and performance, with a name that means quality, beauty, and durability.
